Banana Shot With a Marvel Spider-Man Thing

In an Oakland California dairy factory, longtime employee Gummo Coola, a banana, was accidentally shot by a Marvel Spider-Man toy built to emulate a Peter Parker web-slinging wrist attachment contraption, in a big way. The shrieking Gummo was lock-glued on old wall next to official dairy staff cafeteria restrooms, unable to move. The banana tried waving its little stick arms about but only managed to attract a large male gorilla, who rode a Greyhound bus from Griffith Park in Los Angeles wearing Burberry plaid shorts and holding a purple-white umbrella. The gorilla made grunts and stares at the banana, but offered no help and suddenly walked away, perhaps to a bar. Oakland police then landed a fancy Sikorsky helicopter in the factory grass outside, and the hapless banana was valiantly clip-rescued from the wall, post haste...then placed in a blender with chili-chocolate powder and a splash of mint, wonderfully consumed thereafter on the spot with a small amount of Mère Crème à la Vanille de Madagascar on top. "Well, that's showbiz," said high-fashion dairy manager Jane A. Hampshire III as she produced a large pink polished grapefruit to quickly replace Gummo and carry all milk business to normal. More news as we get it, and maybe a caramel-waffle sandwich, too.

End.
